

Brian Anweiler

Brian Anweiler is currently the athletic director at Wake Technical Community College in Raleigh, NC. Prior to Wake Tech, Brian was at Northern Virginia Community College, in the greater Washington, DC area, as the College-wide Student Life Director. He was at NOVA from January 2009 to August 2019 after spending 17 years at Tallahassee Community College.

In his role at NOVA, Brian worked with students on collegewide initiatives including intercollegiate athletics, recreation, student media, student leadership recognition and development, and other academic competitive teams. NOVA is the 14th largest and 9th most internationally diverse college or university in the United States.

Brian held several positions at TCC. He started at TCC working with the men's basketball team as a student assistant and subsequently worked his way into several leadership positions. His tenure as athletic director at TCC was highlighted by many exciting achievements for the Eagles. In 2006, the TCC's men's basketball team played in the NJCAA Division I national championship game. In 2008, the TCC Eagles softball team also competed in the national championship tournament.

In addition to his experience directing two-year college athletic programs, Brian served for over nine years in the TCC Communications Office. He worked closely with the media, covered countless college events and served as the interim communications director.

Brian also served as an adjunct professor at George Mason University in the School of Recreation, Health, and Tourism from 2012-19. He is a 1994 graduate of TCC. Brian earned his bachelor's degree in media communication from Florida State University in 1997 and earned his master's degree in Physical Education (Sport Administration) in 2000 from FSU.
